

Two people travelling through O'Hare should describe their combined luggage even when one packs far more than the other. For a Chicago airport transfer, the useful question is what the whole party needs to carry. An average such as "one suitcase each" can misrepresent a pair with an uneven load.

Start by listing each traveller's items privately, then combine the information into one request. You do not need to label the bags by person unless that helps with ownership or handling. The provider needs the total number, general sizes, and unusual items. A light packer does not cancel out a large rigid case or an equipment cover brought by the companion.

Avoid the average-bag shortcut

Consider a hypothetical couple visiting Chicago. One brings a backpack and a small rolling case. The other brings several suitcases and a garment bag. Both might describe the trip as a two-person booking, but that description leaves the most important fit question unanswered. Record the bags themselves instead of letting the passenger count stand in for packing information.

Unequal packing can create a communication problem as well. If the person booking is the lighter packer, they may assume that their companion has similar needs. Ask directly before sending the request. A simple conversation about what is already packed is more reliable than guessing from the length of the visit or the airline ticket.

If one bag has a handling requirement, name it separately. Perhaps it contains a delicate personal item and must stay upright. That is a request to discuss, not a promise that a chauffeur will provide a particular loading method. Give the outer dimensions and explain the concern without asking the reader to infer it from the contents.

Keep the shared plan fair and clear

Both travellers should read the final luggage description. This gives the heavier packer a chance to catch an omission and the lighter packer a clear understanding of the agreed load. It also prevents a disagreement in which one person believes an additional bag was included and the other knows it was never mentioned.

Ask the provider to confirm the proposed limousine arrangement against the combined passenger and luggage needs. Do not assume that an unused portion of one person's imagined luggage allowance transfers to the other. Ground transport is being agreed for an actual set of belongings, Chicago O'Hare Limo Service not for a personal quota that the travellers can redistribute.

The same principle applies after a Chicago visit. The light packer may gain gifts while the other traveller sends some belongings elsewhere. Your return request should reflect the new combined load. Update the inventory rather than repeating the original description simply because the passenger count stays at two.

Before the O'Hare pickup, decide which traveller will communicate with the chauffeur and keep the luggage list available to that person. The companion can concentrate on checking that every bag is present. Separate those small responsibilities if it helps your party, while keeping the provider's agreed arrangements intact.

Uneven luggage needs are manageable planning information. The mistake is hiding them behind an average. Describe the real mix, confirm fit for the whole party, and share one accurate version of the request.
