

Build a yard brief around everyday use before choosing individual landscape features. Describe the routes people need, the places you want to spend time and the existing parts of the garden you want considered. This gives a landscape discussion a clear starting point.

Describe the activities that matter

Explain how the space is used now and what you would like to change. Keep essential routes separate from optional features. Photographs and a simple sketch can help show the relationship between entrances, existing planting and the areas under discussion.

Make priorities visible

Identify which changes matter most and which could wait. If you are unsure about a feature, record the question rather than treating it as a fixed requirement. Ask how a proposal responds to those priorities and what information is still needed. Keep the brief with later quotes so you can compare the proposed work with the use you originally described.

Prepare the next property discussion

Use this discussion guide alongside the notes for your own property. For "A Yard Brief Should Explain How You Want to Use the Space", identify the first question that needs an answer and record which part of the brief it affects. Keep <https://riverljb1542.iamarrows.com/a-deep-dive-into-landscaping-companies-in-chicago-il> that answer with the current proposal so the next conversation starts from the same description of the work.
